Overview:

Ohio State University Wexner Medical Center has developed a leadership development series for their residents. They developed the series for several reasons. First the residents don't always see themselves as leaders. The program recognized that their residents, when they struggle, do so with professional issues rather than clinical knowledge or application. They sought a more intentional way to train accountability, emotional intelligence, communication, time/stress management, self-awareness, etc. The attached description includes the elements of the program, goals, and how they plan to assess outcomes of this program.
